KEY MESSAGES AND CONCEPTS

KEY MESSAGES

- Sexual exploitation and abuse and sexual harassment inflict intolerable harm on the victims\(^1\), their families, and their communities; it affects many aspects of their lives, their interactions with others, and their safety and well-being.
- When humanitarian workers abuse the very people they are meant to be helping, this is one of the gravest violations of the trust placed in us. It is similarly unacceptable when colleagues or partners are targeted.
- The damage done can also have a major negative impact on our credibility and funding which, in turn hampers our ability to deliver and support people, thus causing further harm.
- It is positive, however, that incidents are coming to light. More and more, victims have started to speak up. One can never underestimate the amount of courage this takes and we must find every way possible to lighten this burden. Victims must be at the center of everything we do.
- It is true that the vast majority of us are committed professionals. But do these abuses happen and do we need to work together to understand why and how to prevent them. One case is one too many.
- We have brought our efforts to tackle sexual exploitation and abuse and sexual harassment together as they are both rooted in power differentials and gender inequalities, and the needs of the victims are similar.
- We need to foster workplaces of inclusion, respect and accountability, where sexual misconduct is not tolerated.
- We have made a lot of progress internally and with our partners in addressing this issue, but we need to recognize the complexities of this task and that we still have a long way to go on this collective journey.

1. We use the term victim in accordance with terminology used across the United Nations (including by the Office of the Victims’ Rights Advocate), while acknowledging fully that victims of sexual misconduct are also survivors, and that for many the term survivor has a more empowering connotation.
